TWELVE PRIVATE VILLAS · JUBILEE HILLS · HYDERABAD

露 地

THE ROJI — 露地 — THE DEWY PATH

How you arrive determines what you experience inside.

The roji is not a path. It is a choreography. Sen no Rikyū understood that a guest who has been physically and mentally prepared by the walk through the garden will experience the tea room differently than one who arrives cold. Every element of the roji was designed to achieve this preparation: the uneven stepping stones to slow the pace and force attention downward. The narrow passage to compress the field of vision. The stone water basin (tsukubai) requiring you to crouch — the same height as the host — before entering.

By the time you reach the nijiriguchi (the crawling entrance door, 60cm square), you have already shed the world outside. The tea is almost incidental. Roji's twelve villas inherit this logic. The gate, the forecourt, the approach, the pivot door — each one is a stage. You do not arrive at your home. You are received by it.

The Arrival Sequence

FIVE STAGES · GATE TO THRESHOLD · DESIGNED TO PREPARE

STAGE 01

門

The Estate Gate

The outer gate (soto-roji). The transition from public to private. Solid, slow, deliberate. The world outside becomes background noise. At Roji: black basalt and recessed hardware. No display. The gate is not a gesture — it is a seal.

→

STAGE 02

石

The Stone Path

Tobi-ishi — stepping stones. Set at ankle-width intervals. You cannot run. You must look down, attend to the ground, slow your breathing. The path does not go straight. It curves. Impatience has no purchase here.

→

STAGE 03

庭

The Garden

The inner garden (uchi-roji). Moss, stone, mature canopy. No ornamental planting — only what belongs to this particular soil. Prashashan Nagar's existing trees are not landscaped around. They are designed with. They arrived before you did.

→

STAGE 04

水

The Water Basin

Tsukubai — the crouching basin. Water before entry, the act of washing, the ritual of slowing down. At Roji each villa's forecourt holds a shallow water element — not for decoration, but for the same reason Rikyū placed the basin where he did: to interrupt habitual motion.

→

STAGE 05

扉

The Pivot Door

The threshold — the last stage before the interior. The pivot door at Roji is solid teak, slow-opening. Its weight is intentional. The act of opening it requires presence, not effort. By here, you have already arrived. The door is a formality.

Each villa holds its own approach. No two paths alike.

NEGATIVE SPACE · PAUSE · INTERVAL

The neighbourhood that cannot be entered accidentally. You are always going there deliberately.

The roji philosophy requires a site that has already done part of the work — a place where the approach begins before the estate gate. Prashashan Nagar, Jubilee Hills, is such a site. Its roads do not connect to anything beyond themselves; there is no through traffic, no commercial strip, no shortcut. To arrive here, you have already chosen to. The road narrows. The canopy thickens. The noise of the city drops three registers before you reach the gate. By the time you are pressing the intercom, the roji has already begun. Roji's villa sequence extends this logic inward — through the forecourt, along the stone path, past the water basin, to the pivot door. Ten minutes from HITEC City. Already somewhere else.

THE DEVELOPER

SSquare
Est. 1991

Thirty-five years building Hyderabad's commercial infrastructure. Over ten million square feet — privately held, privately financed, delivered without announcement. SSquare does not need to explain its track record. Its buildings explain it.

Roji is SSquare's first and only residential project. Three decades of material knowledge and construction discipline, applied — for the first time — to the place where twelve families will live. The same rigour. The same standard. The same patience with process. Applied now to sequence, threshold, and the long work of arrival.

"The Standard, Privately Held."

35
Years in commercial real estate

10M+
Square feet delivered

1
Residential project. This is it.

TWELVE PRIVATE VILLAS · JUBILEE HILLS · BY SSQUARE

Roji

露 地

The walk home is part of the home.